On August 25, 1939, The Wizard of Oz opened in theaters around the United States.

Based on the 1900 children's novel The Wonderful Wizard of Oz, by L. Frank Baum (1856-1919), the film starred Judy Garland as the young Kansas farm girl Dorothy, who, after being knocked unconscious in a tornado, dreams about following a yellow brick road, alongside her dog Toto, to the Emerald City to meet the Wizard of Oz. Dorothy encounters the Scarecrow, the Tin Man, the Cowardly Lion and the Wicked Witch of the West. The scenes in Kansas were shot in black and white, when they arrive at Oz it appears in vivid Technicolor, a relatively new film process at the time. Nominated for an Academy Award in the Best Picture category, The Wizard of Oz won a Best Song Oscar for "Over the Rainbow," which became one of Garland's signature hits. Garland won a special award at that year's Oscar ceremony, for Best Juvenile Performer.

The Wizard of Oz was a modest box-office success when it was first released, but its popularity continued to grow after it was televised for the first time in 1956. An estimated 45 million people watched that inaugural broadcast, and since then The Wizard of Oz has aired on TV countless times. Today, some of the film's famous lines, including "There's no place like home" and "Toto, I've a feeling we're not in Kansas anymore" are well-known to several generations of moviegoers.
