Golf Ball Dimples

The golf ball technically isn't round. If you look up close, you'll see that the outside of golf balls are filled with dozens of little dimples. This wasn't always the case, but some savvy golfers noticed that older balls with bumps and nicks would travel further. These small imperfections create turbulence in the air surrounding the ball, which helps to reduce drag. Eventually, golf balls were designed with dimples as a way to create turbulence so that balls get more lift and reach greater distances. They are one reason professional players today can hit the ball so much further than players of past generations.

Loop On Back Of Shirt

On many nice, collared shirts there is this mysterious loop in the middle of the back. We have the Navy to thank for the loops on those shirts. There isn't a lot of closet space while you're out at sea, so sailors would have loops on their shirts so they could just hang them on hooks. College kids in the 1960s also utilized the loops, as they could hang up their shirts and keep them neat and wrinkle-free while at the gym. Today, manufacturers put them on shirts as a sign of class and quality. Also, young ladies sometimes pull the loops of boys they like, so there are still a practical reason to have them on shirts.
